Discussion on the XML registry and Repository:

- Michael presented the straw man proposal
- Michael suggested that we need a mechanism for selecting a specific version of a component. He suggested an ivy (Apache open source product) like versioning where the user could indicate the latest or a specific version. It would also handle dependencies.
- Instead of using the straw man approach, Gideon proposed that the list of selected types in the R&R be saved and named so that the same components could be loaded again.
- Instead of putting all the new types for a developing standard in the top level schema, Gideon suggested the R&R could have a development library with the same selection list functionality as the released libraries. This library would be organized by namespace so that different standards could have their own development types with the same name
